FARMING Roots that run deep

Pulses: the food of the future

A staple in traditional cuisines across the globe, pulses — which include beans, peas, lentils and chickpeas, among others — are packed with benefits for both people and the planet. Enjoyed in soups, stews, falafel, hummus, curries, tacos and more, these tiny powerhouses are high in protein, low in fat and loaded with vitamins and minerals. What's more, pulse crops are drought-resistant and have a low carbon footprint, providing a sustainable dietary staple to feed the planet's ever-growing population.

Wholesome nutrition

Cultural groups around the world have been consuming pulses for centuries, and with good reason. A vital source of plant-based protein and dietary fibre, pulses are beneficial to our overall health. They contain a number of essential vitamins and minerals like iron, zinc, folate and magnesium. Furthermore, pulses can help achieve healthy cholesterol levels, reduce the risk of heart disease, stabilize blood sugar and improve gut health. A single cup of cooked pulses contains more than half of the recommended daily fibre intake.

Eco-friendly farming

Beyond the human diet, pulses also have a positive impact on the environment. In addition to requiring less water and energy to grow than other crops, they produce fewer greenhouse gas emissions, which are a common agricultural by-product largely caused by the use of nitrogen fertilizers. Pulse crops possess nitrogen-neutralizing properties and are able to convert nitrogen found in the air into a natural fertilizer that crops can use.

Sustainable future

Today's farmers face the challenge of producing more and more food to meet the demand of a growing population while leaving behind the smallest possible environmental footprint. Pulses provide an affordable, nutritious and sustainable alternative to traditional sources of protein like red meat, poultry and fish.

Spicy chickpea burgers, red bean brownies, butterbean casseroles, baked curry lentil cakes — pulses aren't just good for soups! Visit www.pulses.org for a variety of healthy, mouth-watering recipes to try.
